THE Director General of the Paris Exposition of 1889, in his official report on the Fine Arts Exhibition, said: "The United States Section was but a brilliant annex to the French Section. . . . The ambition of American artists evidently is to interpret the world of to-day; but they have come to us to get their method of expression. . . . It would be difficult to mention many men who do not draw their inspiration directly from French masters."

With this official comment in mind the Director of Fine Arts for the United States at the present Exposition has endeavored to place before the world a collection of American art that cannot be justly characterized in like manner. During the past decade the United States has made unparalleled progress in all things, but in none is this progress more noticeable and pronounced than in the Fine Arts. Ten years ago there were very few institutions sufficiently well equipped to supply the ever-growing demands for education in art, and the student was instructed by men fresh from the European schools. It was then necessary that the student should go to Europe, not only to broaden his conceptions, but really to learn the means to execute them. Paris, which was universally admitted to be the art centre of the world, became the Mecca for most of our students, and it is only natural that they should have acquired many of the mannerisms and methods of their masters. But since the Exposition of 1889 American art has to a great degree emancipated itself from foreign trammels, and entered upon a career of its own,— expressing American thought and reflecting American nature. To-day we have many well-equipped institutions in which the student can develop an artistic temperament on his native soil, in which individuality is recognized and encouraged, while the necessary methods of expression are being learned. It used to be said that landscape was the only field for native art; but the splendid growth of our figure painters, of portraitists of the first rank, of mural painters and masters in stained glass, who meet and successfully compete with those of Europe on their own ground, make this statement no longer tenable.

To such fearless and dominating personalities as the late George Inness, Homer Martin, A. H. Wyant, and a score of others who are still living, we must look for the establishment of a National Art. These men sound a clear, strong note of originality; and their influence on the art of their country is pronounced and permanent. It is not of painting alone that this statement is true. Our sculptors, architects, and illustrators are among the best in the world; and our engravers on wood have long since been acknowledged pre-eminent.

In forming the present exhibition, the object of the Director of Fine Arts has been to place before this conclave of nations a truly representative American exhibition. To insure this result, he appointed as his advisers, both in America and in Europe, the strongest and ablest of our artists in the various fields represented, forming juries before whom every creed and cult found support and sympathetic attention. It is, therefore, confidently believed that no phase of American art produced during the past decade has been omitted, but that all phases are represented by the most characteristic examples obtainable.

That the space allotted to the United States in the present Exposition is inadequate must be greatly regretted, as many of our able men are of necessity insufficiently represented; but the policy adopted by the Director of Fine Arts in the beginning, and strictly adhered to, was not in the interest of the individual, but of National Art, and the result must be just recognition of our artistic strength, which will place us beside the strongest.

Much is due to the public spirit and generous aid of some of our best-known institutions of art, and to many connoisseurs, who have made the present exhibition possible by lending their most valued works; and the Director of Fine Arts wishes to take this opportunity to acknowledge their kindness and co-operation.

THE EDITOR.

Explanatory

To simplify the finding of the various works in the United States Section of Fine Arts, the Director has placed a special number on all of the Exhibits in his department: thus each work exhibited has two numbers, the French official number and this special number, the latter being indicated on the small BRASS TAG. On the paintings these special numbers are arranged (in all but one room) in their proper numerical sequence, and this Catalogue conforms with them. In the Exhibits of Miniatures, Drawings and Etchings, Sculpture, and Architecture, it was not possible to provide the publishers with the proper sequence of location in time to arrange the Catalogue in conformity therewith; but in all these classes the Exhibits can be easily identified by the special BRASS TAG NUMBER.

* DECORATIONS IN THE NATIONAL PAVILION

MURAL DECORATIONS

Decoration of Lunettes and Ceiling in Rotunda	E. E. Garnsey
